GRAND GULF CEMETERY

GRAND GULF, MISSISSIPPI

INTRODUCTION

GRAND GULF

You will have to look closely to find Grand Gulf, Mississippi on your map. It is not even shown on some maps of this State. Yet, in a by-gone era, Grand Gulf was a flourishing trade-center and River Steamer port on the Mississippi River. The remains of this ghost town are located about 15 miles south of Vicksburg, Mississippi. The all but forgotten Cemetery is located a short distance from the one small store and few scattered houses and shacks which are all that remain of the once populous and thriving City of Grand Gulf.

CLAY COUNTY, MISSISSIPPI

The search for this lost and almost forgotten Cemetery was made because of the stories my Grandmother told me when I was a child. She told me of the beautiful homes that had been built high on the banks overlooking the river. She told me of the huge plantations and hundreds of slaves that worked them. Her stories of a life of splendor and elegance and how these things were destroyed by the War Between The States have remained with me always. One of the big battles of the war was fought through this town and across the Cemetery. Remains of the trenches are still to be seen by anyone making the trip.

I vividly recall the stories my Grandmother told me of her escape from the "Yankees" and about the lovely old home my Great Grandfather left behind.....The years went by and I simply could not find the time to search out this Cemetery until May of 1956. My brother, my husband and I made a special trip for this purpose and it was a saddening but rewarding experience. The Cemetery is almost obliterated. It is overrun with vines, brush, moss and weeds. Cows graze all over it and scratch themselves on the few upright tombstones. Age has eroded the inscriptions on many of the tombstones, some are buried in the earth but those which are still legible record a long and varied history. A Yellow Fever Epidemic is recorded by this inscription :

Port Caesar Chapter

"Henry Tullidge Dean
Born in Erie, Pennsylvania
Died of Yellow Fever at Grand Gulf Sept. 8, 1853"

2038059

A violent murder is told by another inscription. The explosion of a Mississippi River Boat and the death of one of its passengers is recorded. There are dozens of similar stories recorded on the tombstones. One must search carefully and diligently to find them as head pieces are broken and scattered, bases are cracked, eroded or broken. Fences around private vaults have crumpled and snakes, spiders and insects abound throughout the lush overgrowth.

Now a Ghost Town

GRAND GULF WAS IMPORTANT SHIPPING CENTER DURING 1800s

By GEORGE PRENTICE

State Times Asst. Feature Editor

On the eastern edge of a U formed by a sharp westward bend of the Mississippi River a few miles south of Vicksburg lies the ghost of Grand Gulf.

Expanding civilization and the ravages of nature have nearly obliterated the features of the once important river town and shipping center.

During the pre-war days of the mid-1800s more than 1,000 persons had settled at Grand Gulf.

Today, according to rough estimates, there are 32-15 white and 17 Negro.

Grand Gulf derived its name from the whirlpools and eddies formed in the Mississippi by the current from the Big Black River and by a sandstone cliff jutting into the river. Dangers of the whirlpools were well-known to all boatmen of the big river.

Cotton and other products were shipped from as far away as Jackson to Grand Gulf for trans-shipment. In 1835 the river town ranked third in commercial importance in Mississippi. And for the next 20 years more cotton was shipped through its facilities than from any other point in the state.

Standing on a rise of ground several hundred yards from the river one can look over the site which once supported river-front docks, offices for cotton brokers from both American and English business interests, a hotel, railroad turntable and a depot.

From the open-air pavillion which today is a part of Peggy's Store, Grand Gulf's trading post, the eye scans a field of cotton, rows of withered corn stocks and a sea of weeds.

During the summertime a lake-bed, which once nurtured the tempestuous might of the Mississippi, is invisible.

Several yards beyond the lake Mississippi boats still ply their trade. Boat whistles echo through the hills and rebound from walls of old, weatherbeaten frame homes of the community's scattered residents.

These houses and an historic hilltop graveyard are the remaining symbols of Grand Gulf's past.

During the 1800s Old Man River flowed across what is now the lakebed. Lashing, shifting, and cutting into the binding banks the Mississippi slowly chiseled closer to the town's hotel, and business houses. Cutting the earth from around dock pilings, and eating at the foundations of other structures, the river slowly chopped at the town's nerve center.

As the river cut into the bluff, parts of the town were moved piecemeal away from the damaging current. And in the face of relentless mother nature, man threw in the towel. Shipping firms established centers elsewhere. Business offices were razed.

In 1862 most of the town's remaining buildings were destroyed by federal gunboats running the batteries in successive campaigns against Vicksburg. The fall of Grand Gulf in 1863 was the prelude to the siege and fall of Vicksburg. From that time until the end of the war, the river town was used as a supply center for Union troops.

Then, ironically, the fickle Mississippi began cutting a channel to the west leaving in its wake the lakebed.

Today, the trench used by Union soldiers as they approached the river from the Grand Gulf side, is plainly visible from its line overlooking the townsite. The ditch runs along the towering ridge north and east of the community, beginning at the edge of the town's graveyard.

Forty-five-year-old Charles Terrell, life-time resident of Grand Gulf, and owner of Peggy's Store, said only a few of the barren land marks remain as indicators of the community's early importance.

"Perhaps Grand Gulf will grow again," he said wistfully as he surveyed the emptiness between the pavillion and the river. "The river is shifting back this way."

Terrell pointed to the weed-infested ridge winding into the hills from its point of origin near the river. "That's where the old railroad came into the town, he said, "Every once in a while we find some of the old rail spikes that were commonly used during the last century, but mostly all that's left is the ridge."

Near the ridge is a mammoth pit which housed the turntable.

Near the intersection of two dirt streets is a frame store with a sign above its sagging porch roof which reads "Grand Gulf Store." A Coca Cola sign indicates that it might still be used.

In the hilltop graveyard, trees, brush and vines have assumed command. Headstones have been toppled, and marble, above-the-ground encasements have been broken and robbed of what few valuables might have been buried with the dead of the past generation. Cattle graze in the family plots.

Historic markers still legible are some indication of the times past. One reads "In memory of Sinclair Taylor, born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 18, 1806. Died of Cholera on board the S. D. Saranack No. 2, July 21, 1851."

Another:

"Otis P. Luther, native of Fredonia, N.Y., was killed in a tornado at Grand Gulf, Miss. March 21, 1853. Aged 23 years, 11 months. This tribute is placed here by his brothers, operators on the N.O. and Ohio Telegraph Line."

Today residents of Grand Gulf get their living from the soil and the river. Some till their fields of cotton and corn, others are productive commercial fishermen.

All hope that as the river swings back eastward and the "ole Mississippi" once again laps the fringes of the bluff, Grand Gulf will recover "at least a little of its old glory."
